

Clacton County High School Brings a new dimension to learning with DisplayNote

Introduction

DisplayNote met with Alex Cooke at the BETT Show in London. Alex is Director of Teaching and Learning at Clacton County High School and was the winner of a free presenter license of DisplayNote software at BETT.

"I started to use the presenter version and I loved it. So much so I decided to roll it out across all classrooms."

Clacton County High School is a champion of embracing new learning technologies and DisplayNote has allowed the school to improve the teaching and learning process by tying their investments together and helping them to use them effectively as collaborative learning tools.

DisplayNote in Action

Alex uses DisplayNote in most of his lessons to engage with resources from anywhere in the classroom via the free app on his iPad. The software allows him to share any of his content with the rest of the class and instantly display and annotate students work.

The ability to link student devices to his own content allows Alex to make instant assessments and engage students through their own devices. Alex says:

"I now engage more with my iPad and interactive board, making my lessons more interactive and engaging for students. The students really enjoy using the software and they look forward to lessons that involve using it."

Making the iPad a Tool for Learning

Allowing teachers and presenters to share any content with participants, using DisplayNote means teachers like Alex can use their iPads more effectively, more often and as a true tool for learning.

"DisplayNote allows my students and me to interact with lesson resources in a new and more engaging way. It brings a new dimension to the new technologies we are investing in allowing them to be used more as collaborative learning tools."

DisplayNote allows me to use the iPads more as a learning tool and classroom aid rather than a word processor and internet research tool."

"I started to use the Presenter version & I loved it. So much so I decided to roll it out across all classrooms."
